He was summoned to the District-Attorney's office, and at once identified the girl as his daughter.

She denied the identification, but when O'Neill had told his story, she broke down and confessed that he was telling the truth. She said that she had given a fictitious name to save her parents from being disgraced.

When the case was opened this morning Assistant District-Attorney Clarke made a statement of the case. He told the facts given above, and apologized to Mr. Garnon for doubting his story. Mr. O'Neill then went on the stand and tested that he had brought the girl from England when she was eleven years old. She had been here ever since. He had not seen her for two weeks prior to the assault. She had spent her time visiting friends in the city. He knew Miss Prendergast, and the girl was probably looking for her when she was attacked.

At the direction of the Court the jury gave averdict of acquittal, and Murray left the court-room, after thanking all those concerned.

The girl was sent back to the House of the Good Shepherd.
